خلاصه مقاله:

Development and its dimensions are some of the topics addressed by political geographers more or less. The cornerstones of development in political geography, from the national perspective are decentralization and transferring the responsibilities of the national government to local governments in provinces and states to actualize development by local institutions. In recent years, political geographers have also addressed the international dimension of the development and non-development of the countries caused by the international dimension. The purpose of this research is to study the views and opinions of political geographers about development and its dimensions and an analytical-descriptive research method was used. National and international authoritative sources and texts on development were used from the perspectives of political geographers. The findings of the study show that national, local, and international development influenced by theories of modernization and social science dependency have been the main topics of much concern to political geographers. Since development and its forms alter the territorial, social, and economic environment of countries and their inner regions, it is very necessary to study development from political geography perspectives. It is imperative today for the central government to delegate the realization of development, especially sustainable development, to local governments and to play the role of policymaker, provider of strategies, and supervisor in the development of the political geography of the countries.
