This study focuses on two of the most significant challenges in distance learning, the student-to-student and student-teacher interaction issues, by studying the interaction experiences of a group of students who have had a distance education experience. This study found out teachers attempted to find out what the students think of their interpersonal behavior in the class. The quality of interpersonal teacher behavior and relationship with the students is an indication of the quality of leadership in the classroom. So different methods such as using maps, creating groups to make group works, using online courses and email and etc. were used and investigated and it was shown that most of these methods have effective impact on classroom interactions
