خلاصه مقاله:

Sine Kurdish language is the mother tongue of many people all over the world, examining its sociolinguistic features (as one area of studying a language) is of crucial concern. For this purpose, attempt was made to analyze one aspect of day-to-day interactional discourse including greetings by Kurdish sociolinguistic community of Ilam province (westpart of Iran). The study investigates the types and structural organization of Kurdish sequence and also the sociolinguistic factors. It also examines the functions of greetings in the life of people among different ages. Analysis was made on the recorded and transcribed speech of various dialects of Ilam among various ages. Results indicated that greeting establishes the interpersonal relationship and is a normal sociolinguistic routine. This study also suggests the existence of various types and forms of greetings of different dialects of Ilam based on discourse differences
